

Cosmopolitan recognition: three vignettes

Q1 SHANNON K. BRINCAT

School of Government and International Relations, Griffith University, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

E-mail: s.brincat@griffith.edu.au

This paper examines recognition in the cosmopolitan sphere of recognition – a sphere of ethical life and social freedom formed in the processes of recognition between individuals and groups across, over, and beyond, the state. The paper contends that Honneth’s recognition theory can overcome many of the limitations inherent to established cosmopolitan paradigms, and, through normative reconstruction, provide a unique methodological framework from which existing cosmopolitan social relations can be examined. The paper argues that only a form of mutual recognition that satisfies both local and cosmopolitan ties of political community could adequately secure the intersubjective conditions necessitated in the Hegelian, ontological notion of freedom (freedom as ‘being at home with oneself in one’s other’). This contention is pursued through three interrelated arguments: (i) an engagement with Honneth’s analysis of the intersubjective conditions necessary for leading a ‘good’ or ‘successful’ life through mutual recognition; (ii) deploying the method of normative reconstruction to identify social freedoms in the cosmopolitan sphere, and; (iii) by exploring the existence of cosmopolitan recognition as a unique form of personal relations, an extension of rights in transnational civil society, and, as a unique form of solidarity in an emergent cosmopolitan public sphere.

Keywords: recognition theory; cosmopolitanism; Axel Honneth; critical theory; human rights; social freedom; ‘love, rights and solidarity’

Many remain skeptical of cosmopolitanism both as a theoretical construct and as a political project. It is widely seen either as Western and modernist; a fetish of the American Academy; a programme labouring under an unabashed liberal ideology that barely masks a universalist quest for domination; or something purely idealistic against a global political landscape that remains firmly particularistic and statist.¹ It is not the purpose of this paper to engage this array of criticisms but to outline an alternative, relational approach to cosmopolitanism through recognition.

¹ For a critical survey of these readings of cosmopolitanism see Ingram (2013, Chs 1–4), Harris (2003), Brennan (1997, 317ff).

Recognition theory is premised on an intersubjective notion of freedom, derived from Hegelian philosophy, and expanded in the social theory of Honneth and his method of normative reconstruction. Its defense of a lived social freedom for all members through the mutual recognition of the needs, respect, and esteem, of individuals and groups, establishes a grounding of cosmopolitan politics within a positive account of diversity and difference in social relations – thereby distinguishing itself from those cosmopolitan approaches that operate under a closed monistic horizon or fixed institutional model. By using Honneth’s recognition theoretic, the paper offers to reconstruct cosmopolitanism by locating it within some already existing relational practices and institutions of personal, private, and public, spheres of social life and to develop a cosmopolitan approach within this relational register.

The normative, political, and theoretical, implications of what I term in this paper cosmopolitan social-relations are significant and yet under-theorized in the literature. These relations refer to those between individuals and groups across, over, and beyond the state. Such relations are not bound solely by the juridical relations between self and other within the state or localized forms of ethical life (though they may originate and form a part of such spheres) and are global in scope or operation. Adapting Honneth’s theory of recognition and method of normative reconstruction offers an analytical and methodological framework that can investigate these social relations and thereby move past two of the key limitations identified in contemporary cosmopolitan thought: the myopia of statism that continues to prevent the examination of social relations beyond the formalized relations within this geographical, spatial, and temporal construct, and, beyond the assumptions of nominal individualism that underlies cosmopolitan conceptions of civil society that reduces this sphere solely to a realm of strategic interaction. In distinction, through recognition theory, cosmopolitanism can be extended to the standpoint of human society or social humanity (to borrow from the Thesis on Feuerbach) in which intersubjectivity replaces these one-sided statist or nominalist ontologies. This leads into the political claim of the paper, that cosmopolitanism in IR must be rethought in ‘relational’ terms rather than in state-centred models (whether of a Kantian/federative or Wendtian/world-state typology), or the proceduralism of global institutional reforms (that would be disconnected to the people who would live in it), or through cultural developments refracted through a monist lense that would be oppressive in its particularity. Such models do not countenance the possibility of constructing cosmopolitanism through multiple traditions and forms of socio-cultural life, nor do they take seriously the question of grounding cosmopolitanism within real social-relations, without which cosmopolitan formalism, proceduralism, or moralism, would remain extraneous impositions rather than lived freedom. The benefit of recognition theory for cosmopolitanism stems from its unique capacity to meaningfully engage with socio-spatial relations at both local and global levels through which people construct their identity and on which they are reliant for the articulation, recognition, and actualization, of their freedom. The stakes cannot be higher in this debate. For without providing a frame that is grounded in real conditions that allows for a radical diversity in socially lived freedom and that permits open-ended processes for the continual expansion of freedom, cosmopolitanism will remain a dead or oppressive tradition. At the same time, if we abandon cosmopolitanism which, at its most basic conception holds to the promise of ethical human community that actively promotes the freedom of all, then we lose any grasp on the political question of our species: how can we live together and achieve the ‘good life’ for all?

To establish a groundwork of cosmopolitan recognition, the article proceeds in three sections. The first engages with Honneth’s idea of the struggle for recognition for achieving the social conditions necessary for leading a ‘good’ or ‘successful’ life, a claim that is foundational for why we should be politically interested in mutual recognition in world politics at all. The second section outlines Honneth’s method of normative reconstruction as a means to identify and explore the unique form of social freedom in the cosmopolitan sphere. The final section then deploys this method to examine three processes of recognition in cosmopolitan social relations located in forms of personal relations, in the extension of rights, and forms of solidarity in the global public sphere. The conclusion speculates on the ideal political and legal institutionalization of cosmopolitan recognition.

Honneth’s recognition framework: intersubjectively shared social freedom Honneth’s recognition theory has yet to exert the influence on International Relations (IR) theory than it has in sociology and political science. While there is an emerging literature on recognition processes between states (see Lindemann and Ringmar 2012; Duncombe 2015), alongside some broader explorations of Hegelian themes of recognition in world politics (Haacke 2005; Heins 2005; Brincat 2015; Daase et al. 2015) – not to mention the significant advances in constructivism that developed through Wendt’s productive use of recognition (1999, 282ff) – there has been little engagement with the recognitive relations between individuals and groups that take place across, over, and beyond, states. An exception has been the Burns and Thompson’s (2013) excellent volume that engages some of the themes regarding Hegel, Honneth, and global justice but even this does not explore the implications of recognition for cosmopolitan thought. These processes of recognition in cosmopolitan social-relations constitute an entirely unique dimension beyond the local forms of ethical life captured 114 in Honneth's triad of 'love, rights and solidarity', all of which take place 115 within the state (see Honneth 1995, Ch. 5). Analysis of these cosmopolitan 116 forms of recognition are also absent in other models of recognition (i.e. 117 Taylor 1992), and even in critics of recognition such as Markell (2003). 118 Q2 Despite this lack of engagement, it can be readily assumed that in the 119 conditions of late capitalism this sphere of global interaction bares 120 tremendous impact on individual and group identity. For if recognition 121 were to be cut-off at the local sphere of sittlichkeit, identity would be 122 fettered in a truly oppressive form of isolation: one would be recognized 123 locally but not in the world. Such recognition is partial, incomplete, one- 124 sided – it requires what Honneth should call a more comprehensive 125 actualization (Honneth 2014a, 8–10). For recognition takes place at any 126 point of interaction: it does not stop at the fence-line of one's village nor the 127 border of one's state but can, and does, take place across, over, and beyond 128 them – as has been done throughout the history of human relations, not 129 only between individuals and groups but all the way up to civilizational 130 encounters (see Cox 1995). 131

Despite these fairly obvious considerations, the vast majority of engage- 132 ments with recognition (including Honneth's) remain bounded by the state 133 as if this represented the outer limit of human community and bounded all 134 processes of recognition. This is partly explained by the fact that Honneth's 135 account remains located almost solely with Western European historical 136 experiences and the institution of the nation-state, specifically its modern 137 liberal democratic variant. This obvious Eurocentrism and Westernism has 138 been a constant hindrance to the emancipatory project of the Frankfurt 139 School (see Hobson 2007; Brincat 2012), for it has meant a myopic gaze on 140 only one source of social structures supportive of emancipation. The 141 argument of this paper offers a corrective by claiming that there are far 142 wider forms of social freedom, nascent though they may be, in the cosmo- 143 politan sphere. To borrow from Honneth's own reasoning, the normative 144 claims within this sphere have 'not yet been redeemed in the historical 145 process' and yet are 'filled with social demands for the realization of insti- 146 tutional promises of freedom' (emphasis added, Honneth 2014a, viii). That 147 is, although transnational civil society and the global public sphere exist 148 only in rudimentary forms, their actuality nevertheless presupposes a nor- 149 mative sphere of human relations that possesses their own practices of 150 recognition, and, their own unique social demands for the realization of 151 institutional promises of freedom. Of course, in comparison to the state, 152 these may seem relatively underdeveloped in terms of institutionalization. 153 Yet, such cosmopolitan social relations will become only more and more 154 essential to individual autonomy given the expanded circles of interaction 155 partners that is characteristic of late, ‘globalized’ modernity. If we take 156 ‘relations of recognition as being constitutive for all of social reality’ it 157 follows that ‘we must recognize that any explanation of social processes 158 necessarily invokes prevailing norms and principles’ within the totality of 159 social reality (emphasis added, 2012, ix). Cosmopolitan ethical life is 160 therefore necessarily implied in Honneth’s theory of recognition. Such 161 relations in the world already possess (limited) institutionalization through 162 international law, normative political principles, and basic ethical 163 practices – all of which, prima facie, affirm the existence of recognitive 164 processes beyond the state, however, weak they may appear in comparison 165 with local forms. For these reasons, to extend recognition theory to 166 transnational or extrastatal relations of individuals and groups seems to be 167 a logical development of the theory itself. The task then becomes 168 one of locating and exploring the ‘norms and principles’ that pervade the 169 cosmopolitan sphere, a question taken up in the final section of this paper. 170 But why should we be interested in recognition at all in IR? The key 171 importance lies in its relational ontology and the different foundation 172 this can bring to understanding cosmopolitan community. Honneth’s 173 recognition theory retains the ‘ethical core’ of CT regarding the idea of a 174 socially effective rationality that could overcome social suffering and the 175 violation of the conditions for a ‘good’ or ‘successful’ life for all. It believes the 176 ‘pathology of reason’ – the distorted social developments endemic to late, 177 global capitalism and liberal modernity – can be remedied practically. In this 178 approach, a negative state of society is determined to the degree by which not 179 all members are provided the opportunity (and conditions) for successful 180 self-actualization. Honneth has deployed various ways to express the ethical 181 content of such practices: as something necessary for individuals to 182 meaningfully direct their lives, or, as the requirement for self-actualization 183 under conditions common to all (2009, 22–23). Both of these ideas harken 184 back to Hegel’s famous entreatment that we cannot be free alone: that 185 freedom is ‘to be with oneself in the other ...’ (1970, § 24A). Here, freedom is 186 a social achievement. Conversely, any ‘deviation’ from this ideal of a socially 187 situated freedom of ‘leading a successful undistorted life together’ is believed 188 ‘must lead to a social pathology insofar as subjects are recognisably suffering 189 from a loss of universal, communal ends’. This loss is experienced as suffering 190 because it is only together, through refined intersubjective relations, that the 191 conditions for our own self-actualization – with and through all others – can 192 be secured. The exposition of those circumstances that block or inhibit this 193 process should then have the ‘rational force’ to convince subjects to overturn 194 such distortive practices to ‘create’ the necessary ‘social practice[s] of 195 cooperation’. For this fundamental reason, Honneth’s has sought to revivify 196 the struggle of recognition through which this ideal of mutuality can be better 197 established – either through the expansion or extension of recognition processes – through which all social members can relate their freedoms to one another ‘cooperatively’ (2009, 24–26, 29). Emancipation, then, hinges on securing the social conditions necessary for attaining this positive self-relation with all others through processes of mutual recognition.

The question of how to universalize freedom has been perennial one for cosmopolitanism – the fears and indictments of the imperialistic and exclusionary tendencies of cosmopolitanism all stem from this central problem. It is through this question that recognition can enter such debates in IR by providing a positive account of diversity in claims of individual and group freedom. Honneth carefully positions his recognition theory in two ways. First, he anchors his approach in Hegel’s account of the struggle for ideal of ‘intersubjective understanding’ that makes possible the specification of ‘politically significant’ emancipatory practices through domination-free networks of interactive relations (see Honneth 1991, Chs 7 and 9; Honneth 1995, 97, 106, 115, 117–18, 120, Chs 1 and 5). Second, Honneth situates The Struggle for Recognition in opposition to the philosophical anthropology of Hobbes and Machiavelli whose atomistic ontologies allege egocentricism and competitiveness as intrinsic to humankind. Contesting such ontologies that deem social conflict to be motivated solely by self-preservation, Honneth suggests that social struggles are motivated by moral impulses, specifically, violations of social relations of recognition. The violation of moral expectations for recognition – and the perception of these failures as injustices, disrespect, or denigration² – provide Honneth with a model of social struggle towards the establishment of ideal processes of mutual recognition. At the nominal level, it is the individual or group’s moral sense of wrongful violation of a moral expectation for recognition that motivates struggles. At the ontological level – and why recognition is deemed to have a universally emancipatory character – is because all humans require recognition as essential for their own stable construction of personal identity and self-actualization, a basic pre-requisite to their freedom. Taylor, in similar manner, calls recognition a ‘vital human need’ (1992, 26). Struggles for recognition, then, are a ‘central medium’ in humankind’s process of ethical development towards a ‘state of communicatively lived freedom’ (Honneth 1995, 5–10, 13).

Whilst reliant on some of the most highly contested fields in social theory (see esp. Honneth 1995, Chs 3 and 4; Honneth 2012a, 228; Honneth 2014a, 35), ² Consistent with the broader German translations, ‘to recognize’ is to ascribe an individual or group some positive status and, conversely, to ‘disrespect’ or ‘denigrate’ includes a broad range of failures to recognize including, but not limited to, humiliation, degradation, insult, disenfranchisement, and physical abuse (see Anderson 1995).

Honneth justifies the emancipatory potential underlying recognition matter-of-factly: ‘the reason we should be interested in establishing a just social order is that it is only under these conditions that subjects can attain the most undamaged possible self-relation, and thus individual autonomy’ (2003, 259). Moreover, to deflect charges of relativism, Honneth affirms that whilst recognition is universal in its necessity for stable identity formation, the actual practices of recognition are immensely diverse and can be satisfied in any number of ways. For Honneth, there are a ‘multiplicity of forms of recognition’ varying with the layer of personality to be affirmed. While the need of love, rights, and solidarity forms an ‘anthropological constant’ the social expectations of recognition can, and will, vary across time and place (see Honneth 2007, 351; Honneth 2008, 130). In other words, recognition is a genus comprising various forms rather than one set social practice. This myriad forms that recognition may take are, however, all ‘practical attitudes whose primary intention consists in a particular act of affirming another person or group’. Due to this affirmative character, Honneth regards them as ‘unambiguously positive’ because ‘they permit the addressee to identify with his or her own qualities and thus to achieve a greater degree of autonomy’ (2012a, 81). Consequently, self-autonomy is seen as dependent on the social establishment of relations of mutual recognition within three primary relations: love and friendship (related to needs and self-confidence); legally institutionalized rights (related to dignity and respect), and; ethical life (through the esteem of one’s unique attributes in society). By experiencing these forms of recognition the individual comes to experience themselves – and all others – as possessing a certain status: as the bearer of needs, as a bearer of responsibility (and agency), and as a bearer of something unique, something of social value. The actualization of self-autonomy is therefore predicated on the intersubjective achievement of self-confidence, self-respect, and self-esteem, achieved through the ‘recognition by others whom one also recognizes’, that is, mutually (Anderson 1995, xi). These ideal social conditions are typically expressed as the triad of ‘love, rights and solidarity’ that, taken together, provide the social context necessary for the ‘practical relation-to-self’ to emerge (Honneth 1997, 234, 237). A disturbance or distortion in this process is marked by domination, not just in communicative relations, but in patterns of recognition also. The ideal of mutual recognition thereby offers a standard of critique of existing social conditions that do not meet the requirements for stable identity formation and self-autonomy. That is, all societies – including international society – can be judged by the degree to which all members are provided the opportunity (and conditions) for successful self-actualization. Moreover, the ideal of mutual recognition provides a reason for social struggles against existing distorted or limited processes of recognition and thereby a vision – 277 however, contingent – of what, and how, social institutions can and should 278 be augmented, changed, or modified accordingly. 279

Since its publication in 1995, the central tenants of Honneth’s account 280 of struggles for recognition have been well-traversed. But it is only in 281 combination with Honneth’s more recent work that we can begin to more 282 fully explicate the stages of identification/autonomy that subjects must pass 283 through with the social conditions necessary for their actualization. For 284 Honneth, to constitute mutual recognition such social practices must ascribe 285 a special type of normative status on individuals and ‘co-produce’ a specific 286 form of individual relation-to-self (2014a, 105). Society is described as a 287 ‘layered arrangement of recognitional relationships’ either more, or less, 288 corresponding to the ideal of mutuality (see Honneth 2012a, 24–26; 289 Honneth 2014a, 46). The content of these ‘layered arrangements’ are 290 essential for the simple reason that ‘freedom cannot be realized without 291 taking into account the institutional forms that enable its realization’ and 292 hence the normative legitimacy of any society is dependent on whether and 293 how it ensures the basic preconditions of individual self-determination 294 (Honneth 2014a, 41, 16). For Honneth, it is only within institutions marked 295 by ‘complementary role obligations’ that ensure the recognition of others 296 activities as conditions for one’s own aims. Here, personal relations, the 297 market, and the public sphere, form the ‘relational institutions’ (Parsons) or 298 ‘ethical spheres’ (Hegel) of potential social freedom. But, the reality or 299 actualization of freedom within these spheres can ‘only be given if we 300 encounter each other in mutual recognition and can understand our own 301 actions as a condition for the fulfilment of others’ aims’. For it is only under 302 such conditions that ‘we can experience the realization of our own intentions 303 as something that is entirely unforced and thus “free” because it is desired or 304 strived for by others within social reality’ (Honneth 2014a, 124). Mutual 305 recognition, in this way, can be seen as the: 306 reciprocal experience of seeing ourselves confirmed in the desires and aims 307 of the other, because the other’s existence represents a condition for 308 fulfilling our own desires and aims. Once both subjects recognize the need 309 to supplement their respective aims, thus seeing their own aims in the other, 310 merely reflexive freedom becomes intersubjective freedom ... Subjects must 311 have learned both to articulate their own aims to the other and to 312 understand the other’s articulations in order to recognise each other in their 313 dependency on each other (Honneth 2014a: 44, 45). 314

So, by examining the personal, private, and public spheres for those 315 institutions that ensure ‘reciprocal comprehensibility’ between interaction 316 partners, society can be judged as ‘bundles’ of behavioural norms, expectations, and practices, that socially integrate individual aims. 317 Through these practices established in social institutions (albeit practices 318 that are never fully secure but which must be performed), subjects have an 319 ‘upbringing’ (Bildung) within reciprocity in which their goals/aims can only 320 be satisfied through complementary acts of others and are appreciated as 321 such. It is a ‘closed feedback loop’ that constantly invites the realization of 322 complementary and cooperative aims (Honneth 2014a, 48, 49), coupled 323 with the potential for struggles for expansion/extension where these 324 practices or institutions are unsatisfactory or incomplete. Because such 325 institutional complexes provide subjects with social conditions that allow 326 the reciprocal realization of freedom, they thereby constitute ‘congealed’ 327 forms of mutual recognition, ‘lasting embodiments of intersubjective 328 freedom’ (Honneth 2014a, 53). 329

The implications of these core tenants of Honneth’s recognition theory 330 for my argument are twofold: that the claim to cosmopolitan recognition 331 stems from the very fact of being human and the need for stable identity 332 formation that corresponds to this cosmopolitan sphere, and, that the 333 existence of such cosmopolitan relations amongst peoples of the world can 334 be reasonably demonstrated. These are not mutually exclusionary tasks: 335 what is required is first to first show that there are presently such recognitive 336 interactions in world politics, and, then examine the relative strength of 337 these patterns for identity formation, judged by their level of reciprocity or 338 institutionalization. The theory does not require that cosmopolitan 339 recognition patterns must manifest in strong interactions nor have reached 340 the ideal of mutuality. For even if they are weak, distorted, or poorly 341 institutionalized, not only demonstrates their existence (however, 342 insufficiently articulated within international society) but, on the premises 343 of the theory itself, would suggest sites of possible future struggles for 344 recognition. As the final section demonstrates, there are identifiable forms 345 of such cosmopolitan recognition processes in world politics, regardless of, 346 however, relatively under-developed they are practiced in comparison with 347 the institutionalization of the state or market. 348

In many respects, my argument follows Deranty and Renault’s (2007, 92) 349 call for the politicization of recognition – or the realization, through 350 politics, of the normative demand for autonomous identity – made within the 351 context of IR. However, there have also been various criticisms of Honneth’s 352 theory on this point. Fraser, perhaps most famously, has posited that parti- 353 cipation is required for just social relations, something that, for her, can only 354 be attained through status, resources, and voice. Here, recognition can only 355 play a limited social role. Honneth has responded, however, by claiming 356 recognition is essential to form integrated social identities and self-actualiza- 357 tion, and therefore constitutes something necessarily prior to questions of 358

Q4 justice and distribution (Fraser and Honneth 2003, Ch. 3). Rancière, in a 359 a more recent dialogue with Honneth, has challenged that recognition theory 360 relies on an overly substantial conception of identity. Honneth has 361 countered that recognition provides the possibility for the increasing 362 possibilities for social freedom in which struggles for recognition are 363 ongoing sources for socio-political transformation (Honneth and Rancière 364 2016). It is not the purpose of this paper to engage all such criticisms of 365 Honneth’s framework, or recognition generally, something that would 366 require a separate project. But what is of importance is how Honneth’s 367 replies to these various criticisms indicate that if recognition promotes 368 integrated social identities and self-actualization, and, increases possibilities 369 for social freedom, then there is a demonstrable need to explore the impli- 370 cations of recognition in the context of world politics and the possibilities of 371 the social relations in the cosmopolitan sphere – something Honneth 372 (2012b) has only begun to examine. 373

Normative reconstruction: understanding cosmopolitan forms 374 of recognition 375

But how can we examine this sphere of cosmopolitan recognition, given 376 that one of the typical detractors of the cosmopolitan tradition is its alleged 377 lack of political actuality – the objection that its ‘vision’ is simply not the 378 case in today’s world? One of the fundamental contributions of Honneth’s 379 later work is the method of ‘normative reconstruction’ that he develops to 380 answer just such a question. Honneth (2012a, 60) deduces that as we 381 cannot make appeals to activities external to society without falling to 382 utopianism or moralism, it follows that we must instead draw upon the 383 norms that already constitute rational claims in society. This is consistent 384 with the methods of immanent critique of the Frankfurt School. Rather 385 than drafting some ideal conception of the good, normative reconstruction 386 traces the relations, values, and ideas, that are already embedded in society 387 (Honneth 2014a, 59–63). Using this approach, Honneth charts the 388 Das Recht der Freiheit (Right to Freedom) as it has developed historically in 389 social relations and been socially institutionalized – a deliberate extension 390 of Hegel’s Philosophy of Right that reconstructed ‘rational institutions’ 391 defined as those social institutions that guarantee freedom (2014a, 1). 392

Normative reconstruction does not merely reinforce what is already 393 embodied in ethical life but is intended to ‘correct and transform’ such 394 practices dialectically by anticipating ‘other paths of development’ that 395 have not yet been exhausted. That is, it seeks out the ‘potential for fostering 396 practices in which universal values can be realized in a superior, i.e. a more 397 comprehensive and suitable fashion'. Expressed alternatively, it seeks out 'the neglected potential of already existing institutions'. The method becomes a procedure for criticizing social reality by exposing the gap between values and their actualization (Honneth 2014a, 8–10). So the purpose is not just reconstruction but the critique of the structural normativity of social institutions in order to grasp the various social forms in which freedom manifests itself, to thereby unveil the social defects and pathologies, the missed opportunities and possibilities, of human freedom within social reality. Normative reconstruction is prefigurative but socially grounded, seeking to build upon (or make consistent) the normative principles of society and their normative practice. In short, it aims to hold society to account for its promises of freedom. Whilst a seemingly boundless task given the number and complexity of social norms, the method focusses only on those institutions that are 'indispensable for social reproduction' as determined by the respective function they fulfil for the actualization of social freedom (Honneth 2014a, 6). This allows the method to systematically examine the forces of social integration that guarantee social freedom, defined as those institutions marked by 'complementary role obligations' that ensure the recognition of others' activities as conditions for one's own aims through 'unforced reciprocity' (Honneth 2014a, 55, 56).

The method pursues the systematic examination of what forces of social integration exist within each constitutive spheres of human freedom at a given time, that is, in primary relations, civil society, and public-life. Analysis traces how these spheres have historically developed to institutionally embody a 'particular aspect' of individual freedom, which can then be judged by the 'degree to which the understanding of freedom institutionalized within them has already been socially attained' (Honneth 2014a, viii). It is here that Honneth admits a crucial part of this method through which cosmopolitan social relations can be reconstructed and their function of social freedom understood. He does this in two ways. First, Honneth states that '[n]ormative reconstruction must be directed towards the entire spectrum of reciprocal social relationships if we are to truly disclose all the conditions under which subjects achieve autonomy' (emphasis added, 2012a, 49). Second, Honneth focusses only on those social relations that guarantee social freedom, those that ensure the recognition of others activities as conditions for one's own aims (2014a, 55, 56). The former implies that we must look to all such social relations through which subjects achieve social autonomy, including those in the cosmopolitan sphere, however, weakly these may be institutionalized. The latter holds that we should then focus on those types of relations that possess reciprocal role obligations purposed towards social activities that ensure the recognition between interactive partners. Honneth focusses his attention on those institutions considered reproductive for social freedom within the state (primary, social, and public spheres) and yet, on this basis, we 440 would be equally justified in pursuing a fourth dimension of cosmopolitan 441 recognition in the world, charted through the sequence of developments in the 442 spheres of freedom that must be achieved to form ‘stable institutions’ or 443 ‘habitual attitudes’ towards mutual recognition in world politics. Put simply, if 444 normative progress is traceable through greater degrees of individualization 445 and social inclusion in practices of recognition, as Honneth claims, then the 446 cosmopolitan sphere forms a crucial dimension for the necessary expansion 447 and extension of recognition in the world (2014b, 563). 448

Honneth has recently grappled with some of the questions arising from the 449 turn to recognition in world politics. Focussing on recognition between states, 450 he has suggested the possibility of reducing conflicts and improving peaceful 451 cooperation through ‘sustained efforts at conveying respect and esteem for the 452 collective identities of other countries’ (Honneth 1997, 33–35). Yet, he 453 has deliberately eschewed engaging with questions of cosmopolitan social- 454 relations and their connection to the triad of ‘love, rights and solidarity’. 455
 In fact, Honneth openly doubts whether differentiating between various 456 modes of recognition at the highly aggregated level of entire populations, 457 such as states, is appropriate. For him, judging whether such populations 458 are struggling for ‘signs of goodwill, legal equality, or esteem in the eyes 459 of the other side’ is almost impossible given that populations are far too 460 heterogenous and individual members’ motives too diffuse to be sufficiently 461 integrated (Honneth 2012b, 33). Yet, as Ringmar (2012, 7) has countered, 462 while this may be true as a matter of empirical investigation, it has no bearing 463 on analytical distinction. The heterogeneity of state populations may preclude 464 any simple ‘up-scaling’ of individual psychological and group sociological 465 processes of recognition to state populations, but it is not prohibitive 466 of studies, like my own, that seek to analyse cosmopolitan social-relations 467 between individuals, groups, and peoples across states because such differ- 468 entiation remains possible even at this scale – albeit with considerable research 469 challenges. In fact, by examining the level of cosmopolitan social-relations 470 through the recognition framework and the method of normative recon- 471 struction, such practices cease to remain abstract and nebulous and can be 472 differentiated through any number of empirical processes/phenomena of 473 interaction/s observable in the cosmopolitan sphere. In a recent reply to 474 sympathetic critiques of his account of recognition in IR, Honneth has noted 475 that some aspects recognition in this dimension have not yet received sufficient 476 attention (i.e. colonialism) and expressed support for the importance of 477 transnational solidarities as a crucial element of recognition in IR 478 (2014b, 564, 65). Moreover, as Honneth has called the domain of recognition 479 in IR as a ‘moral substrate’ indicates that it does form part of the totality of 480 such recognition processes in social life, something that hints at a ‘supra’ 481 cosmopolitan dimension that corresponds to the individual situatedness in the world (2012b, 25). Under the pressures of increased global interactions stable practices of recognition are essential not only to ensure basic (non-violent) encounters with others but also to ensure the far more arduous task of ensuring sufficient processes for the fulfilment of autonomy than what is possible at the local sphere alone. As we shall see in the next section, elements of recognition in this cosmopolitan sphere are already present, however, much they lack sufficient institutionalization and comprehensiveness.

Recognition and cosmopolitan social-relations: three vignettes

We have seen that the normative ideal of recognition promotes integrated social identities and self-actualization, and, increases possibilities for social freedom. Honneth has been concerned with uncovering these processes in personal, private, and public spheres, within the state. But do they also exist in the cosmopolitan sphere? The task of this final section is to identify the existence of such processes within cosmopolitan social relations and assess their relative strength (i.e. demonstrating the level of freedom socially institutionalized and the level of reciprocity within such practices between interaction partners). Borrowing from the framework of The Struggle for Recognition, this section examines some examples of cosmopolitan practices of recognition related to neediness and self-confidence; respect and dignity; and forms of self-esteem. At the same time, following the method of normative reconstruction from Honneth's Freedom's Right, it discusses the institutionalization of these practices of recognition in the cosmopolitan sphere that would qualify them as 'mutually complementary role obligations' that ensure the recognition of others activities as conditions for one's own aims (Honneth 2014a, 127), or expressed in another way, the degree or comprehensiveness to which they permit the addressee to identify with his/her own qualities and thus achieve a greater degree of autonomy (Honneth 2014a, 81). I outline three dimensions to this 'moral substrate' of cosmopolitan recognition that map neatly onto Honneth's framework and which indicate the normative horizon that 'patterns' recognition in world politics. The three examples include (i) the enhancement of personal freedom through expanded forms of interaction in personal relations of love and care; (ii) the legal recognition of moral personhood under the universal human rights (HR) regime in transnational civil society, and; (iii) international social movements and forms of deliberative institutions in the global public sphere. It should be noted that while presented as separate, each sphere overlaps, so that the struggles and institutions, and, the misdevelopments and pathologies in each sphere, affect the others. Moreover, for reasons of length, only one example is given in each vignette and are intended to spur further research, rather than to be taken as covering-the-field. That is, the list is indicative, with the vignettes chosen as illustrations of cosmopolitan recognition rather than being exhaustive of all such practices.

Love, self-confidence, and personal relations

In personal relations – such as friendship, family, and physical relations – subjects gain emotional experience of others as a condition for their own self-realization on the basis of need and affection. Such relations are foundational as they embody a form of relation in which the ‘inner nature’ of the individual ‘is set free by mutual confirmation’; they involve forms of interaction ‘whose reciprocal fulfillment allows us to experience the intersubjective realization of our respective individuality’. It is this experience of ‘reciprocal fulfillment’ that allows the basic intersubjective realization of one’s respective individuality in, and through, the other (Honneth 2014a, 132–34). From his earliest writings in System of Ethical Life to the Philosophy of Right, Hegel consistently referred to love as an ideal external relation in which the individual attains self-awareness only by regarding ‘the other as other’ (Honneth 2014a, 43, 44, citing Hegel 1991, § 7, 42). Such affirmation through affective relations are limited, however, for in comparison with legal rights that obligate all social members to treat others according to equal claims, love cannot be generalized beyond a small circle (Honneth 1995, 49, 107, 156–59). This lack of generalizability may make it appear that cosmopolitan social-relations can only be loosely tied to this primary circle of love, given that the innocuous and the seemingly non-political nature of interpersonal relations, whilst of considerable importance to the individuals involved, seem to bare little impact on world politics. Yet, love and friendship facilitate the development of fundamental relation-to-self (i.e. the expression of one’s needs and desires without fear of abandonment) and are therefore a precondition for the development of all other forms of self-respect. As such, the sphere of love is of acute social significance for individuals to feel their natural neediness is institutionally protected in a specific form of mutual recognition forming elementary self-confidence (Honneth 2014a, 154). Its primary basis represents a ‘kind of school’ for the ‘structural developments within the human psyche’ necessary for modes of comportment in private and public life (Honneth 2012a, ix–x). As Honneth affirms, whilst personal relations may have considerably less ‘institutional anchoring’ than the private and public, changes in the institutionalization of personal relations ‘are just as socially significant as those in economy or society’ (2014a, 134).

Personal relations are reliant on intimacy, privacy, and reduction of constraints on the personal relations we may choose. That is, the experience of reciprocal recognition in individual freedom can only be achieved through the ‘aid’ or support of permissive social institutions that give space, legitimacy, and respect to such personal relations through which subjects can begin to relate to each other reciprocally and thus actualize certain aspects of their autonomy (Honneth 2014a, 45, 46). The question then centres on the presence of supportive infrastructure in the cosmopolitan sphere for friendship, intimate relationships, and families, without which the autonomous aims of subjects could not be fully secured or integrated. Developments around marriage is the obvious example and in the cosmopolitan sphere we find strong legal opportunities to secure such relations across state borders (Visas and migration), and we can trace similar historical development such as the declassing and deracializing of friendships and intimate relations across state borders. In part, the freeing of such relations corresponds to Kant’s cosmopolitan right of hospitality (2005, Third Definitive Article, 105ff) that whilst ostensibly restricted to the right of movement/visitation and non-outrage, by invoking some sense of a responsibility of the community to which the ‘other’ has presented, performs the social function of creating space – and thus extending the possibility – for personal relations to emerge and flourish in the cosmopolitan sphere. Moreover, basic relations of love are essential for acknowledging the neediness of others in the international community and are therefore foundational to forms of solidarity for the suffering of others linked to humanitarian assistance, aid, and development. Indeed, if love is concerned with reflections of neediness between self and other, then empathy and emotional engagement cannot be excluded from cosmopolitan recognition process but are intimately bound to them. A lack of empathy, especially indifference to human suffering in cases of natural and humanitarian crises, will be felt as disrespect by those people affected – we can think here of the continued indignation of the Rwandan people against the Western passivity in 1994, or in contrast, the solidarity that emerged in response to the ‘Boxing Day’ Tsunami coloured by colonial representations and ‘pity’ (see Hutchinson 2014). Here, it is the relational aspect of empathy and emotional engagement in cosmopolitan forms of recognition that are revealed as essential to the development and performance of other forms of recognition, both rights and solidarity. Indeed, these more expansive forms of recognition are largely dependent on the prior establishment of conditions in which such personal feelings for the other can emerge.

Arguably one of the strongest examples of emergent practices of recognition supportive of personal relations in the cosmopolitan sphere is found in the struggles for liberation and rights of the LGBTQ community across the globe. In part, this overlaps with struggles for legal recognition of moral personhood under the universal HR regime (and would seem best accounted strictly under ‘rights’ discussed in the next section). Yet, such a move would lose sight of the real lived forms of social freedom through personal relations that such rights are intended to allow the space for. For the LGBTQ community can only experience such personal freedom and overcome non-discrimination if they can sustain the personal relationships they wish.³ Regardless of classification, even in those polities that have tolerant laws for LGBTQ relationships, individuals are disadvantaged by lack of legal opportunities related to economic partnerships (tax and economic security) and familial rights related to adoption, amongst other inequalities. The ongoing denial of marriage rights constitutes an injustice by denying the benefits of heterosexual family system (what Honneth calls the ‘community for life’ that helps support the formation of an individual’s neediness) to such couples; and the repression of such relations of intimacy prevents the actualization of autonomy through bonds of ‘mutual affection’ (Honneth 2014a, 171, 167). The denial of such basic needs has clear infractions on individual autonomy the world over – personal freedom, quite simply, is repressed by others. It is not just that the LGBTQ community lacks access to the family system (nor should it be reduced to this formal claim alone that would be incomplete) but also that the social freedoms that emanate from this institution are constructed on normatively heterosexual terms that limit the expression of personal freedom in dominant social institutions. Some activists view the gay marriage movement as pursuing a distinct form of misrecognition, insofar as it seeks to assimilate ‘queer’ forms of sexuality to a heteronormative standard. Here, recognition is not genuinely mutual but bound to a dominant normativity. Access to marriage ‘equality’ is therefore only partial liberation, requiring a fuller expression that could ensure the freedom of personal relations beyond this dominant framework. Such claims for recognition can never be reduced to the dominant standard even though they may seek entry to it but, consistent with normative critique, the analyst must pursue ways in which these claims can be exceeded beyond their institutionalization. That is, further struggles of the LGBTQ for independent demands of their particularities beyond the ‘majority culture’ (Honneth 2014a, 289) can be expected.⁴

³ A point of clarification is here required, as it may seem that this discussion should appear in the second vignette related to ‘rights’. However, rights, amongst other things, are a space for which personal freedoms can operate. Such legal guarantees enable social freedom but which are largely dependent on what Honneth calls ‘non-legal relations or feelings of commitment to pre-legal norms’ – that is, they are reliant on the social interaction (relations) of ‘non-legally cooperating subjects’ (see Honneth 2014, 86). All spheres are inextricably linked. In this case, intimate relations cannot be divorced from respect of those relations, which in turn cannot be reduced to mere legal notion of respect of equality, but of the pre-legal recognition of the worth of the relation to be attained.

⁴ Arguably, Honneth’s (2014: 150) optimistic assertion that in the long term that justifying exclusion from equal marriage will ‘dry up’ leaving two options, to either abolish marriage

Part of the articulation of these independent demands beyond majority culture is observable in how such struggles have taken on cosmopolitan character, seeking to extend personal freedom and expand the notion of ‘right’. That is, the ‘double movement of globalization’ in terms of LGBTQ rights has expanded the claims to HR as a criterion of validity across all states and furthered such claims as related to identity. The Declaration of Montreal (2006) and Yogyakarta Principles (2007) are viewed as products of the successful intensification of struggles for LGBTQ sexual orientation and gender identity as an application of HR, thus signalling the overturning of previous conceptions of the ‘human’ in which such individuals were absent (see Butler 2004, 17–39). Moreover, transnational activism in this area constitutes a unique form of social struggle, one that has been having demonstrable impact across the globe. Here, new alliances and linkages within transnational networks are helping push forward the actualization of personal relations essential to identity and autonomy that in many respects cannot be satisfied comprehensively within many local contexts. Such struggles require the cultural translation of universal LGBTQ rights into the public discourse of domestic polities by presenting LGBTQ demands as universal demands (see Birdal 2015). Consider the European example in which gay rights are being claimed in two supranational institutions, the European Union (EU) and the Council of Europe. Whilst activities range from official lobbying (through advocacy associations, some of whom have official status in European structures, i.e. the ILGA) to civil disobedience, these struggles are primarily – though not exclusively – framed as one of universal HR related to equality, respect, and freedom. While expressed in the legal nomenclature of right, they are nevertheless for the social actualization of personal freedom – ‘personal relationships [that] represent social relations in which our inner nature is set free by mutual confirmation’ (Honneth 2014a, 132). Cases seen at the European Court of Justice demonstrate the growing legalization of this struggle as a form of state, local, and regional regulation, whereas wider socio-cultural struggles (perhaps most visibly demonstrated in the protests against the Russian Winter Olympics and incarceration of Pussy Riot) are pushing towards processes of recognition in shared cultural practices that produce social legitimation, and can therefore be seen as preconditions for the formalization of legal protections. Stychin has found that framing this struggle in the discourse of universal HR has been successfully deployed in LGBTQ activist struggles outside of Europe in which international legal completely, or, to grant every intimate life partner the official right, nevertheless implies a restriction of its own – a temporal one (i.e. that these relations must be for life).

standards have helped overcome particularities at the local level. This has offered new recognitional practices and infrastructure by which such struggles can appeal to normative principles and practices outside mere local forms of ethical life and at the same time helping reclaim the LGBTQ history of such communities towards the extension of personal freedom (Stychin 2003–2004, 951).

Of course, within existing international institutions these claims are expressed within thematics already established (e.g. as sexual rights clustered in UN forums related to population, health, and violence) (see Wilson 2002, 253–65). The danger in the cosmopolitan sphere concerns whether the articulation of these rights merely reflects the limits of sexual diversity considered acceptable by international society or its dominant cultural pattern at a certain point in history. Recognition could then be grossly inadequate, limited to the categories dominant within the ethical life of international society. Similarly, the push for rights claims renders the struggle unevenly towards legalism, as opposed to the formation of wider solidarities, so that the goal becomes judicial arbitration rather than normative and communicative interaction (Honneth 2014a, 87, 90). The task then is to re-affirm the basis of such claims, not in its exterior form as a claim of right, but as a form of personal freedom in which the liberation of such personal relations is seen by the community as essential for such individuals to be fully self-actualizing (Croce 2015, 2). While the legal procurement of rights may open space (or protect space) for the articulation of personal freedoms they remain necessary yet altogether insufficient for autonomy.

Despite its limits and contradictions, the cosmopolitan dimensions of these struggles of the international LGBTQ community demonstrate a unique transnational solidarism – what has been described as a reconfiguration of ‘the international’ (Baker 2016) – that, once again, demonstrates the key linkages and dependencies between the spheres of recognition and forms of social freedom. The cosmopolitan dimension of these activities has assisted local groups by providing external normative/moral but also practical/organizational resources where such recognitional processes at the local levels have been attacked, blocked, or absent. The successful attainment of rights in a number of states illustrates an effective, albeit partial, institutionalization of these demands. In this sense, the cosmopolitan sphere has proved an active site of recognition practices above, between, and beyond the state. The transnational nature of these actions indicates both an expansion of the circle of recognition for such personal freedom and an extension of the content of the nature of sexual, intimate, or ‘personal’ freedoms than contained in these local spheres alone. Nevertheless, in the conditions of late, global capitalism, the furtherance of

‘the radical egalitarianism of love’ is hard-pressed. As Honneth(1995, 176) 715 posits, such personal relations must not only be pushed for, but defend 716 against, any number of forces emanating from civil and public spheres. 717

Rights, self-respect, and private relations 718

Rights play a significant role in the formation of the practical ego by giving 719 the subject position and dignity as a member of a social community – and 720 hence the wide ranging struggles for the types of autonomous actions that 721 ‘rights’ enable (such as personal freedoms described in the previous 722 vignette). Recognition of individual ‘personhood’ affirms the legal equality 723 and moral self-direction of individuals and is therefore fundamental for the 724 expression of needs in personal life, the pursuit of private freedom in civil 725 society, and the articulation of communicative freedom in the public realm. 726 Simultaneously, rights constitute a layer across the cosmopolitan sphere 727 regarding the universal recognition of respect of these qualities in all 728 human beings, presupposed in the concept of universal HR and coded in 729
 The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) (1948) itself. This 730 cosmopolitan extension and expansion of rights allows the individual to 731 comprehend themselves as capable of participation in all social spheres 732 because they confer the status of a morally responsible person with agency – a 733 capacity reciprocally shared not just between those within formal (state) 734 community (Honneth 1995, 40, 49, 79), but now across all of humankind. 735 Yet, rights should not be elevated one-sidedly, for as stated previously, they 736 only ensure space for the reflexive examination on personal decisions and do 737 not, of themselves, realize such aims (Honneth 2014a, 27, 124). Rights 738 must be articulated not only through legal adjudication but through 739 social-relational and communicative aspects of freedom in community. 740 Despite this limit, however, the scope and content of rights is not determined 741 once and for all. Rather, for Honneth, there is an ‘essential indeterminacy’ to 742 what constitutes a responsible moral agent and therefore a ‘structural 743 openness on the part of modern law to a gradual increases in inclusivity and 744 precision’ (1995, 110). This developmental potential captures the process by 745 which all members of a community experience ‘a gain in personal autonomy 746 in virtue of having their rights expanded’ and through which the community 747 itself can be seen as ‘enlarged’ by increases in individual liberty (Honneth 748 1995, 85, 86). It is through this radical developmental potential that we can 749 observe how cosmopolitan social-relations have contributed greatly to the 750 creation of unique forms of rights by giving both legal and cultural affect to 751 moral personhood under the universal HR regime. 752

For Honneth, the content of self-respect and the universal capacities 753 considered to reside in each individual shifts over time (see esp. 1995, Ch. 6). 754

This developmental potential implies at least three things, all of which indicate the importance of the cosmopolitan dimension to the contemporary actualization of rights. First, there can be an expansion in the number of people who are treated as bearers of such rights through the expansion of citizenship or the coverage of existing legal rights. Second, there can be an increase in the content of what it means to be a bearer of such rights. That is, there can be development of what – at both material and ideational levels – is considered as essential for self-respect and the legal/formal content to reflect such understandings of moral agency. In this case, Marshall’s (1950) account of the addition of welfare rights to existing civil rights is routinely discussed as an example of how the actual content of rights can develop over time. This is indicative of how the content of cosmopolitan rights have developed via similar processes (albeit partial and incomplete) from basic rights in UDHR, to later include wider civil and social content in the related Covenants on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights⁵ and Civil and Political Rights (1966), and further diversifying into specific rights gains for particular groups [i.e. rights of the child (1989), migrant workers (1990), and persons with disabilities (2006), amongst others]. In this history, the formation of the International Criminal Court (1998)⁶ can be seen as the product of the immanent institutionalization of global criminal law that builds on Habermas’ reflections on the universal HR regime as a positive and coercive legal order upon which individuals can make actionable legal claims realized within the context of a cosmopolitan legal order (see Sorial 2008, 241–65). Third, as rights ensure the opportunity for individuals to exercise their universal capacities and thus actualize their social freedom within community, implies that rights need to be reflected widely throughout social relations in order to give affect to the ideal conditions for ‘successful self-actualization’. That is, the full articulation of one’s self-respect necessitates a borderless dimension to rights – an extension of cosmopolitan civil law – so that one’s agency could be expressed throughout the world, the absence of which would constitute an unnecessary restriction of the recognized agential capacities of individuals. Framed accordingly, we can see how the universal recognition of the moral personhood of all human beings has solidified a moral vocabulary

⁵ This covenant, whilst routinely unmet, nevertheless points to the potential for more comprehensive actualization of HR as necessary to further personal freedom. It also highlights a key issue for rights to be articulated meaningfully in the market (see Honneth 2014, viii, 41) – a complex issue beyond the scope of this paper.

⁶ The creation of the International Criminal Court did not, however, bring with it an expansion in the content of legal protections but merely affirmed customary international law. Its primary concern was to create an institutional framework for enforcement that could, however, provide the space for such developments in the future.

and institutionalized processes in which claims for recognition in the cosmopolitan sphere can be practiced and made the site of ongoing social struggles for further development and expansion across both domestic and international spheres. That is, the reasonable expectation of one's recognition as a human being (with capacities shared with all others) has developed from a cosmopolitan principle to a number of formal cosmopolitan practices, through which we can anticipate 'other paths of development' that have not yet been exhausted within these established practices. This nestles with Honneth's expansive notion of autonomy as a 'positive-feedback loop', for the more capacities and preconditions we regard as a necessary aspect of individual agency, the more we have to consider the views of those who they would apply to (2014a, 18). In this way, 'personhood' can be reflected in 'more comprehensive and suitable fashion' (Honneth 2014a, 8), albeit as dependent on social struggles supportive of such practices in the cosmopolitan sphere.

To go back to an earlier theme, it is this relational content of a cosmopolitanism based on recognition that can overcome the tendencies in liberal and proceduralist models of cosmopolitanism that merely insist on rights without establishing prior their social basis that could make them actual. A key example of the cosmopolitan social relations helping to bridge the abstract right of personhood to a lived social freedom was the Anti-Apartheid struggles in South Africa (SA). Here, the developing norms of cosmopolitan recognition already established in the universal right of personhood was a fundamental contribution for transnational activists in securing the moral/legal agency of peoples suffering denigration and domination. Indeed, without this moral vocabulary already possessing sufficient institutionalization in the cosmopolitan sphere would have meant an international community deafened to the cries for recognition of universal personhood. Viewed from a cosmopolitical point of view, this struggle was not only for fundamental freedoms within SA but a struggle for the conception of universal HR to live up to its immanent standard of freedom. This register developed through struggles between the 1960s to the 1990s with the vast majority of international organizations, overtime, coming to impose a range of sanctions (economic, military, and social) against the apartheid regime insisting on the full recognition of personhood regardless of race. The importance of norms in this historical development – how an 'ought' became and 'is' (Klotz 1995, 452) – and the overriding of material/strategic interest of states reveals the key development of cosmopolitan sphere of rights: the articulation of a universal standard that went beyond conventional understandings of rights that were assumed to be determined by purely endogenous normative codes within states. Here, the cosmopolitan sphere was a site that not only lent solidarity to local actors struggling against apartheid but also provided a ‘normative surplus’ and refined conception of the idea of universal personhood that could be utilized by those struggling in SA, and elsewhere. It is little coincidence that some Palestinian activists are using the same language to express their personhood within Israel and the occupied territories (Bishara 2002).⁷ There had, of course, been unanimous, global recognition of rational equality throughout the international community since decolonization, however, incomplete and partial. Yet, it was only the normative pressure of this fundamentally refined conception of personhood exerted at the cosmopolitan level that can explain the shifts that occurred in response to the domestic and transnational forms of struggles against apartheid and which may, therefore, be replicated in similar struggles.

Building on the established practices of a universal conception of civil rights, transnational and local activists pushed these to their logical conclusion for the legal equality of all citizens in SA. Taken singularly these actors appear as a combination of transnational civil society organizations: Pan-African solidarities across states (i.e. TransAfrica) (see Edmondson 1986, 164–211); international coordination of working class solidarity (particularly maritime workers) (Berlau 1995); academic, sport, and divestment boycotts. These were met with state-based forms of support such as the Soviet training of MK fighters in the ANC and, later, economic sanctions, such as the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act (in the United States) (1986). These mirrored domestic struggles such as the consumer boycotts, student and labour strikes, and formation of street councils within SA. Yet taken together, these transnational actors were deploying a uniquely cosmopolitan conception of rights that added to both domestic and international conceptions of racial equality in legal personhood. For it not only sought to overturn apartheid structures, thereby rendering a more inclusive national community in SA, but alter what was considered to constitute moral personhood.

In terms of Honneth’s criteria to determine mutual recognition – that such practices exist and confer a special type of normative status to individuals from which a specific form of individual relation-to-self must be expected (2014a, 105) – the cosmopolitan sphere brought to the Anti-Apartheid struggles a unique claim of recognition. For SA citizenship already presupposed legal personhood, what was lacking was its actualization across races. In this shift, fundamental moral and political conditions of what Fanon described as the non-white being's 'zone of nonbeing' (2008, xii) – the complete absence of social recognition – was, at least formally, overcome. In turn, this provided a refined framework for ongoing anti-racist struggles generated by ongoing legacies of apartheid and colonialism such as access to land, education, and other forms of formal socio-economic exclusions. The releasing of such conceptions of personhood in SA was not only an example of the exercise of moral freedom but, in turn, contributed to the transformation of society by permitting the public and cosmopolitan questioning of the dominant interpretation of the norms that were deemed to already constitute society. Expressed alternatively, the process allowed persons to go 'beyond given systems of norms in a justified fashion ... and propose new systems of norms' (Honneth 2014a, 104, 112). Of course, the political outcome left many economic and cultural inequalities in place, as consistent with the limited power of rights and the realm of civil society. It is therefore imperative to engage with the uneven development of rights in international society and the declining support for social, economic, and cultural rights that has come about with the dominance of capitalist social relations in global civil society, that stifles these other essential rights that would ensure the actualization of personhood beyond mere civic formalism. Nevertheless, civil rights may be seen as a spur for further gains in social freedom by allowing persons the space to take advantage of formal concessions and the legal surety of opportunity for participation in the process of public will-formation (see Honneth 1995, 117). In other words, the emphasis of struggle must be on the changes in behaviour that can come about through the successful winning of rights (Honneth 2014a, 32).

⁷ Unlike the successful example of anti-apartheid struggles in SA, the Palestinian case of struggle for respect is suggestive of continued non-recognition in the cosmopolitan sphere. That is, despite the UN General Assembly’s repeated affirmation of Palestinian rights in the global public sphere, there remains a lack of concerted transnational practice to ensure the actualization of such rights.

Solidarity, self-esteem, and public social freedom

Solidarity can be seen as the public demonstration of the esteem of the value and contribution that the 'otherness' of distinct individuals and groups contributes to a community.⁸ Such recognition is contingent upon a shared perception of those goals that have developed historically for the recognition of specific qualities within a given society (Honneth 1995, 126–30). Despite this seeming deference to common values, solidarity celebrates the radical particularity of each societal member so that struggles for extending the content of esteem and/or the social evaluative framework for esteem, centre on recognizing forms of identity previously ostracized or denigrated

⁸ It is important to note that in Honneth's discussion of state-based forms of recognition, he restricts his discussion to respect and esteem regarding the collective identities of other countries (see Honneth 2012b, 33–35, 1995, 121–22).

(see Honneth 1995, 96–109). What is considered of social value is contingent on a range of historical and cultural factors and is a fluid condition, in which the ideal conditions for the expression of self-esteem are forms of solidarity that are open, pluralistic, and participatory, through which a broad array of qualities can be recognized as valuable. Such diversity not only widens the freedom and quality of community but broadens the potential expression of freedom for each individual. At the same time it implies that cosmopolitanism should no longer be wedded to statism or methodological nationalism that would restrict the public form of social freedom under an exclusionary political model. The key, to repeat once again, is to move to a social-relational grounding of cosmopolitanism.

To be adequately reciprocal, solidarity must inspire not just ‘passive tolerance’ but a ‘felt concern’ for what is particular about an individual, group, or peoples. It is only to the degree that each actively cares (by providing space and conditions) for the development of the other’s characteristic/s that this shared goal between subjects can be realized (Honneth 1995, 129). ‘Felt concern’ should not be mistaken as compassion, the resources of which are limited in world politics, as the literature on the ‘active care for strangers’ demonstrates. Rather, what recognition theory gestures towards is the reciprocal understanding between interaction partners of the necessity for mutual esteem of the attributes or contribution of an individuals/groups for self-actualization. Honneth’s analysis of solidarity, given that it is focused only on local communities within the state, provides only part of the picture. For relations in the cosmopolitan sphere, consistent with increases in interactions through ‘globalization’, require the necessary recognition of esteem for those different ways of life that contribute to international society and the diverse articulation of individual freedoms within it. Honneth (1995, 166ff) has argued that struggles for recognition emerge not just in defence of traditional forms of life but in challenging existing ways of life that have become intolerable. This argument implicates not only local forms of esteem that hinder the expression of wider solidarities beyond it but also those social spheres of interaction that have become a fetter on self-actualization in world politics. However, as cosmopolitan society is only weakly developed and holds highly contested understandings of esteem, this suggests ongoing conflicts regarding both the evaluative framework and the content/qualities that are to be esteemed in the global sphere. Acts of denigration and disrespect cut across states, cultures, and classes, and yet whether the potential for transformative collective action at the cosmopolitan level to expand existing patterns of recognition will be violent, or discursive, or whether they will happen at all, is indeterminate. Struggles of the so-called Fourth World for greater cultural esteem are indicative of such claims for distinct ways of life. Far more violent examples can be seen in the complete ruptures of basic recognition where the ‘other’ is regarded as inanimate or inferior, creating conditions for denigration and aggression found in ethnic wars (Lindemann 2014, 483). Arguably, what animates these two otherwise disparate examples is the deficiency in the evaluative framework of esteem in the cosmopolitan sphere. This is where the importance of the global public sphere becomes acute for it allows for the possible emergence of the ideal communicative form of interaction (i.e. democratic negotiations) as ‘the proper means’ for the realization of such solidarity within community (Honneth 2014a, 564, 565). Of course, we are far from this ideal and yet aspects of it are not only already present but in the process of struggles for their extension and expansion.

In the public sphere, in order to satisfy individual/group need for esteem and the articulation of this social freedom throughout community, solidarity is dependent on at least three things: rationally guided actions (i.e. actions that seek to guarantee individual freedom), a shared evaluative framework, and sufficient institutionalization of such actions. The formal aspect of ‘public life’ such as deliberation and communication in the co-creation of laws, policy, and regulations, are not the self-referential pursuit of egocentric subjects but a dialogue between citizens within the plurality of ethical life – the rational articulation of needs are deliberated rather than one-sidedly insisted on or subjectively pursued (as in the case of rights). This is an idea that Honneth has developed from Habermas’ account of the ongoing deliberative processes of social inclusion within the (statist) public sphere. However, Honneth extends this conception to include counter-publics positing that there are many ‘public spheres’, most of which exist alongside each other without coming into contact (2014a, 258). Voting, assembly, association, and parliamentary legislation, are some of the communicative conditions that institutionalize the public examination of opinions between interaction partners in a discursive exchange about what policies are to govern their community (Honneth 2014a, 260). One could add here the nascent forms of global governance as possessing tendencies towards the same communicative conditions, however, weakly developed they are. Through the historical development of democratic processes – and a host of related norms that enable such participation in shared deliberation – Honneth describes how a ‘reciprocal recognition emerged’ in which members became ‘capable of recognizing each other as equally entitled citizens’ with a democratic will equal to all others (2014a, 261, 266, 267). These processes enable members to ‘take up the perspective’ of the ‘We’ whilst judging the consequences of their own actions and attempting to improve their own living conditions in communication with others (Honneth 2014a, 274). However, Honneth admits that this historical process was politically subsumed under nationalism that placed the loyalty of members over any ‘international convictions’ that could have widened the ambit of such processes of ‘unforced will formation’. That is, the capacity for taking up the perspectives of the cosmopolitan ‘we’ was artificially closed-off by social misdevelopments in, and of, the state. This implies the cosmopolitan public sphere as an intrinsic, even natural, development of public-will formation, despite it being colonized or overridden by the state. Arguably, the forms of regional democratic processes in the EU provide some evidence for the reemergence or freeing of this inclination to cosmopolitanism.

Honneth provides a useful test for the existence of a public sphere today: ‘[o]nly if such a communicative understanding about the consequences of their associated action in the group comes about can we speak of the “We” of the public’ (2014a, 273). The question is then whether we can identify a cosmopolitan public sphere in these terms? As far back as the 18th century, Kant (1979, 153ff) was already observing the emergence of a cosmopolitan public sphere within Europe’s appreciation of the French Revolution in which a ‘judging public’ was considered evidence of the causality of a ‘cosmopolitan freedom’. This was taken as proof of a cosmopolitan public sphere in which ‘a violation of rights in one part of the world’ was now ‘felt everywhere’ (Kant 2005, 107, 108). Forward two centuries, we find 47.8% of respondents identifying as world citizens in the World Values Survey (WVS), and a further 30% of respondents strongly identifying as such (Bayram 2014, 452). For Honneth, along Kantian lines, contemporary evidence of the cosmopolitan public sphere can be found in the ‘feelings of either enthusiastic approval in the case of struggles for emancipation, or with disgust in the case of oppression’ (2014a, 335). History has, of course, displayed both civilizing and de-civilizing processes at work. The dispute over immigration policies across the globe attest that many people do not see themselves primarily as members of humanity, despite whatever the WVS may indicate. Yet, despite the unevenness and reversals of such developments (Linklater 2011, esp. Ch. 4), these demonstrate an institutionalization in the cosmopolitan public sphere of the regard for the ‘consequences’ of humankind’s associated action/s within the whole. Here, debates on the rights and responsibilities of climate change, especially to those of future generations, provides a most telling example. As stated previously, Honneth’s model is based on the existence of many public spheres that allows us to see the formal international political institutions as displaying an emergent form of communicative understanding. Honneth has looked to the UN as a democratic public sphere in which HR has subordinated constitutional rights to international laws (i.e. Russell Tribunal) and the EU as an example of transnational public sphere (despite this communicative potential being overshadowed by concerns for unhindered economic transactions) (2014a, 279, 80, 328). Perhaps more importantly, are what Honneth refers to as ‘de-hierarchical publics on a global scale’ including the ‘transnational communicative communities’ such as NGOs (i.e. Amnesty, Doctors Without Borders, Greenpeace) and, more speculatively, the internet 1028 as a site of a borderless public (Honneth 2014a, 300, 301). Along these lines, 1029 we can identify other cosmopolitan deliberative public spheres such as 1030 the World Social Forum (though this rejects any binding decision-making 1031 capacity) and La Via Campesina that was explicitly created as a transna- 1032 tional communicative institution based on improving the living conditions of 1033 its global members coordinated through a decentralized international 1034 committee. As institutions that include all those to be effected by their 1035 decisions, both bodies demonstrate an institutionalization of a democratic, 1036 cosmopolitan public sphere that possess unique recognition processes from 1037 which to judge the consequences of their actions (Honneth 2014a, 288). 1038

Whether this possibility will lead to the further transnationalization of 1039 democracy is dependent on the willingness of those who identify as 1040 ‘cosmopolitan citizens’ to continue to reconcretize such communities of 1041 interaction, just as it does on those who would resist it. The massive increases 1042 in transnational activism are anticipative of such possibilities in which 1043 solidarity makes participants feel responsible for each other. Yet, this requires 1044 a ‘political culture that nourishes and permanently enriches such feelings 1045 of solidarity’ – and a capacity to resist those challenges from localized 1046 obligations of custom and tradition (Honneth 2014a, 290–92). Lacking the 1047 nationalism and close ethical ties of the state, the cosmopolitan sphere 1048 requires alternative motivational resources to sustain such a movement. For 1049 Honneth the ‘search’ is on for ‘more abstract forms of solidarity’ (2014a, 1050 330). With the dramatic lurch to the far right globally, this possibility seems 1051 more distant than ever. The key challenge is for world citizens to develop an 1052 understanding that the cosmopolitan sphere deserves support because it 1053 represents part of the essential conditions for their own freedom. That is, a 1054 conscious awareness that cosmopolitan social relations can provide an 1055 effective form of solidarity against the vast transnational forces (economic, 1056 environmental, and social) that mere local/national attachments can do little 1057 to mediate effectively. Just as domestic forms of democratic ethical life, 1058 deliberation, and will-formation, must be held by their participants as 1059 ‘institutions of unforced reciprocity in the satisfaction of needs, interests, and 1060 aims’ (Honneth 2014a, 254), so too must social freedom in the cosmopolitan 1061 sphere be deemed as a relation of ‘mutual dependence’ between all individuals 1062 and this ethical sphere (Honneth 2014a, 328, 320). 1063

Conclusion 1064

This article has insisted on pursuing a relational account of cosmopolitanism. 1065 Specifically, it has posited that cosmopolitan forms of recognition are evident 1066 in the forms of personal relations that proliferate over state borders, the 1067 transnational nature of the HR regime, and in forms of global public 1068 life whether of state institutions, non-state actors including global social 1069 movements, an even information sharing networks. Expressed alternatively, 1070 cosmopolitanism already constitutes a realistic expectation of social freedom 1071 in the relations between individuals when we consider human rights, or 1072 solidarity across state borders, or in debates over issues of global affect 1073 (climate, refugees, trade, and so on). Some of these practices have already 1074 been established in institutions, others indicate a widening of interaction 1075 partners and the possible expansion of social freedom in this unique sphere. 1076 From being recognized as bearer of needs, as a bearer of responsibility (and 1077 agency), and as a bearer of something of social value, cosmopolitanism 1078 provides the social freedom that comes from one's recognition as a human in 1079 the world (i.e. being recognized as a universal agent of co-freedom). We could 1080 express this as self-confidence (personal need), self-respect (private, rights), 1081 and self-esteem (public, solidarity), to self-being in the cosmopolitan sphere. 1082

Yet, the examples discussed in the vignettes suffer from many obstacles to 1083 their full realization. Given current socio-political conditions, claims for 1084 cosmopolitan recognition must be directed within nation-states and be 1085 supported by them. Equally so, cosmopolitan relations are ensnared within 1086 capitalist relations of production that permeate throughout transnational 1087 civil society. Without fundamental institutional development, cosmopoli- 1088 tan processes of recognition remain cornered by the state and capital, if not 1089 reducible to either. It is only future struggles that will indicate how this 1090 institutional framework may be transformed – a question of human 1091 agency – and in the absence of which we should not overestimate the future 1092 of cosmopolitan civic and public attitudes. Nevertheless, despite their 1093 weaknesses, these examples do prove the existence of distinct forms of 1094 recognition, their necessity for stable identity formation in an increasingly 1095
 'globalized' world, and possible future sites of struggle towards reciprocity 1096 or mutuality in world politics. 1097

Their limits, however, lead to the question of the ideal form for the 1098 political and legal institutionalization of cosmopolitan recognition – and 1099 inevitably to a discussion of the possibility of a 'world state'. Given the 1100 fetishization of the state in the discipline of IR, this is understandable. But 1101 nothing of the above should be taken as arguing for the suitability or 1102 inevitability of the world state as essential to recognition, as advocated by 1103 some. For example, Wendt has used a conception of Hegelian recognition 1104 (albeit unrelated to Honneth's) to advocate for the inevitability of a 1105 Weberian World State. For him, the rational response to the violent pursuit 1106 of recognition in IR will lead to a world state in which recognition no longer 1107 rests on a 'territorial' but 'global' basis (Wendt 2003, 494, 517). Dufek has 1108 advocated more recently for a 'global state-like entity with coercive powers' 1109 over the ‘kind of non-hierarchical, dispersed and/or decentralized institutional arrangements’ (2013, 177) that my argument gestures towards. Both Wendt and Dufek place problematic limitations around the politics of recognition, however: the former limits recognition to the creation of the conditions of basic security through law (Wendt 2003, 515), the latter, looks to moral imposition through institutional design, rather than the self-actualized freedom of all members. In distinction, whilst we have inherited the state, it is not inevitable, nor would I suggest the most suitable institutional form for mutual recognition across all humanity. Rather, the implications of recognition theory outlined here is that cosmopolitan duties are based on mutual obligations owed between interaction partners, based on reciprocity as understood by the gains for self-actualization for all that such a social freedom promises. As I posited in the opening, recognition processes can be practiced and institutionalized in any myriad of ways. Indeed, the key advantage that stems from this alternate, relational grounding of cosmopolitanism is its non-exclusivity, as opposed to the enforcement through a fixed hierarchical institution. This does not mean passivity to non-recognitive social practices, however. Intolerant or anti-egalitarian practices that reject openness, plurality, and participation – that denigrate love, rights, solidarity, and being – should be struggled against and dismantled for they restrict the recognition of some, and therefore the social freedom of all.

This is premised on the argument that without a cosmopolitan dimension of recognition individuals/groups may secure locally their ‘love, rights and solidarity’ but nevertheless remain misrecognized or unrecognized in the world around them and thus lack vital conditions necessary for their identity, individuality, and freedom in the conditions of late (globalized) modernity. To the degree that individuals have an external personality that must be reflected beyond local forms of ethical life, there must be an additional sphere of identity beyond the state fundamental to the full expression of individual autonomy in the world. The real question regards the requisite level – or the comprehensiveness – of their institutionalization for stable and habitual attitudes of recognition between self and other in this cosmopolitan sphere. How cosmopolitan recognition constitutes a unique sphere of social freedom can only be examined through further research. Rather than seeking to build cosmopolitan institutions and impose them from outside, recognition theory and normative reconstruction offer a way to understand these relations and processes as already existent, however, partial and incomplete their institutionalization. By locating them in existing social relations means that the idealism of cosmopolitanism is no longer a point of critique. Moreover, the diversity of such struggles for recognition demonstrates an openness to the socio-cultural horizon that overcomes any charge of a monist universalism. 1152 Cosmopolitanism must be relational and free, or it will not be at all. 1153

Q7 Acknowledgements 1154

■ 1155

References 1156

- Anderson, Joel. 1995. 'Translator's Introduction'. Translator's Note', The Struggle for Recognition, viii . 1157
- Q8 Anderson, Joel, and Axel Honneth. 2005. "Autonomy, Vulnerability, Recognition, and Justice." 1159
 In Autonomy and the Challenges of Liberalism, edited by Christman J., and Anderson J., 1160 127–49. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1161
- Q10 Baker, Catherine. 2016. 'The 'Gay Olympics'? The Eurovision Song Contest and the politics of 1162 LGBT/European belonging,' European Journal of International Relations (Online First). 1163
- Bayram, A. Burcu. 2014. "What Drives Modern Diogenes? Individual Values and Cosmopolitan 1164 Allegiance." European Journal of International Relations 21(2):451–79. 1165
- Q11 Berlau, Henrik. 1995. "Maritime Unions Against Apartheid." In Embargo: Apartheid's Oil 1166 Secrets Revealed, edited by ■, ■, 296–305. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press. 1167
- Q12 Birdal, Sinan Mermet. 2015. "Between the Universal and the Particular: The Politics of Recognition 1168 of LGBT Rights in Turkey." In Sexualities in World Politics, Chapter 7, edited by 1169
 M. L. Picq, and M. Thiel, ■–■. London: Routledge,. 1170
- Bishara, Marwan. 2002. Palestine/Israel: Peace or Apartheid. London: Zed Books. 1171
- Q13 Brennan, Timothy. 1997. At Home in the World: Cosmopolitanism Now. ■: Harvard University 1172 Press. 1173
- Brincat, Shannon. 2012. "On the Methods of Critical Theory: How CIRT has Advanced 1174 the Project of Emancipation in the Early Frankfurt School." International Relations 1175 26(2):218–45. 1176
- Brincat, Shannon. ed. 2015. Recognition, Violence and the Problem of Ethical Community. 1177
 London: Routledge. 1178
- Q14 Burns, A., and S. Thompson. 2013. Global Justice and the Politics of Recognition. London: 1179
 Palgrave Macmillan. 1180
- Q15 Butler, Judith. 2004. "Beside Oneself: On the Limits of Sexual Autonomy." In Undoing Gender, 1181 edited by J. Butler, 17–39. London: Routledge. 1182
- Cox, Robert W. 1995. "Civilizations: Encounters and Transformations." Studies in Political 1183 Economy 47:7–31. 1184
- Q16 Croce, Mariano. 2015. "From Gay Liberation to Marriage Equality: A Political Lesson to 1185 be Learnt." European Journal of Political Theory ■:1–20. 1186
- Daase, Christophe, Caroline Fehl, Anna Geis, and Georgios Kolliarakis. eds. 2015. Rethinking a 1187 Political Concept in a Global Context. Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan. 1188
- Deranty, J-P, and E. Reanult. 2007. "Politicizing Honneth's Ethics of Recognition." Thesis 1189
Eleven ■:92–111. 1190
- Dufek, Pavel. 2013. "Why Strong Moral Cosmopolitanism Requires a World-State." 1191 International Theory 5(2):177–212. 1192
- Duncombe, Constance. 2015. 'Representation, Recognition and Foreign Policy in the Iran–US 1193 Relationship,' European Journal of International Relations (Online first). 1194
- Fanon, Frantz. 2008. Black Skin, White Masks. New York: Grove Press. 1195

Q17

- Fraser, Nancy, and Axel Honneth. 2003. Redistribution or Recognition?: A Political-Philosophical Exchange. London: Verso. 1196 1197
- Haacke, Jürgen. 2005. "The Frankfurt School and International Relations' on the Centrality of Recognition." Review of International Studies 31(1):181–94. 1198 1199
- Q18 Harris, Ian. 2003. "The Particularity of Cosmopolitanism." Policy Review ■:118. 1200
- Q19 Hegel, G.W.F. 1970. "■." In Enzyklopädie der Philosophischen Wissenschaften, edited by E. Moldenhauer, and K. Michelet. vol. 8 ■. Frankfurt a.m: Suhrkamp. 1201 1202
- Hegel, G.W.F. 1991. Elements of the Philosophy of Right, (H.B. Nisbett, trans.). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1203 1204
- Heins, Volker. 2005. "Realising Honneth: Redistribution, Recognition, and Global Justice." Journal of Global Ethics 4(2):141–53. 1205 1206
- Hobson, John. 2007. "Is Critical Theory Always for the White West and for Western Imperialism? Beyond Westphalian Toward a Post-Racist Critical IR." Review of International Studies 33(S1):91–116. 1207 1208
1209
- Honneth, Axel. 1991. The Critique of Power: Reflective Stages in a Critical Social Theory, (K. Baynes, trans.). Cambridge, MA: MIT Press. 1210
1211
- Honneth, Axel. 1995. The Struggle for Recognition: The Moral Grammar of Social Conflicts. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press. 1212 1213
- Honneth, Axel. 1996. The Fragmented World of the Social: Essays in Social and Political Philosophy, (C.W. Wright Ed.), New York, SUNY. 1214
1215
- Q20 'From Adorno to Habermas: On the Transformation of Critical Social Theory'. 1216
- Honneth, Axel. 1997. "Habermas' Anthropology of Knowledge: The Theory of Knowledge-Constitutive Interests." In The Critique of Power, (K. Baynes, Trans.) ■. Boston, MA: MIT Press. 1217 1218
1219
- Honneth, Axel. 2003. "The Point of Recognition: A Rejoinder to the Rejoinder." In Redistribution or Recognition? A Political-Philosophical Exchange, edited by N. Fraser, and A. Honneth, ■. London: Verso. 1220 1221
1222
- Honneth, Axel. 2007. "Rejoinder." In Recognition and Power: Axel Honneth and the Tradition of Critical Social Theory, edited by B. van den Brink, and D. Owens, ■. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1223
1224
1225
- Q21 Honneth, Axel. 2008. "Between Aristotle and Kant: Recognition and Moral Obligation." In Disrespect: The Normative Foundations of Critical Theory, edited by ■ ■, ■. Cambridge: Polity Press. 1226 1227
1228
- Honneth, Axel. 2009. Pathologies of Reason, (J. Ingram, trans.). New York: Columbia University Press. 1229 1230
- 'A Social Pathology of Reason: On the Intellectual Legacy of Critical Theory'. 1231
- Honneth, Axel. 2012a. The I in We. Cambridge: Polity Press. 1232
- Honneth, Axel. 2012b. "Recognition Between States: On the Moral Substrate of International Relations." In The International Politics of Recognition, edited by T. Lindemann, and E. Ringmar, 25–38. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers. 1233 1234
1235
- Honneth, Axel. 2014a. Freedom's Right. New York: Columbia University Press. 1236
- Honeth, Axel. 2014b. "Rejoinder." Global Discourse 4(4):564–65. 1237
- Q22 Honneth, Axel, and Jacques Rancière. 2016. Recognition or Disagreement? A Critical Encounter on the Politics of Freedom, Equality, and Identity. NY: Columbia University Press. 1238 1239
- Hutchinson, Emma. 2014. "A Global Politics of Pity? Disaster Imagery and the Emotional Construction of Solidarity After the 2004 Asian Tsunami." International Political Sociology 8(1):1–19. 1240 1241
1242
- Ingram, James D. 2013. Radical Cosmopolitanism. Columbia: Columbia University Press. 1243
- Kant, Immanuel. 1979. The Conflict of the Faculties, (M.J. Gregor, trans.). New York: Abaris. 1244

- Kant, Immanuel. 2005. "Perpetual Peace." In Kant: Political Writings, edited by H. S. Reiss, ■. Cambridge: CUP. 1245 1246
- Klotz, Audie. 1995. "Norms Reconstituting Interests: Global Racial Equality and U.S. Sanctions Against South Africa." International Organization 49(3):451–78. 1247 1248
- Lindemann, Thomas. 2014. "Interest, Passion, (Non)Recognition, and Wars: A Conceptual Essay." Global Discourse 4(4):483–96. 1249 1250
- Lindemann, Thomas, and Eric Ringmar. eds. 2012. The International Politics of Recognition. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers. 1251 1252
- Linklater, Andrew. 2011. The Problem of Harm in World Politics. Cambridge: CUP. 1253
- Markell, Patchen. 2003. Bound by Recognition. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. 1254
- Marshall, T.H. 1950. Citizenship and Social Class and Other Essays. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1255 1256
- Ringmar, Erik. 2012. "Introduction the International Politics of Recognition." In The International Politics of Recognition, edited by T. Lindemann, and E. Ringmar, 3–24. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers. 1257 1258
1259
- Sorial, S. 2008. "Law, Cosmopolitan Law, and the Protection of Human Rights." Journal of International Political Theory 4(2):241–65. 1260 1261
- Stychin, Carl F. 2003–2004. "Sam-Sex Sexualities and the Globalization of Human Rights Discourse." 49 McGill L.K 951:■. 1262
1263
- Taylor, Charles. 1992. "The Politics of Recognition." In Multiculturalism and the Politics of Recognition, edited by A. Gutmann, ■. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press. 1264 1265
- Thörn, Håkan. 2006. Anti-Apartheid and the Emergence of a Global Civil Society. London: Palgrave Macmillan. 1266 1267
- Wendt, Alexander. 1987. "The Agent-Structure Problem in International Relations Theory." International Organization 41(3):■. 1268 1269
- Wendt, Alexander. 1992. "Anarchy is What States Make of It." International Organization 46(2):391–425. 1270 1271
- Wendt, Alexander. 1999. Social Theory of International Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1272 1273
- Wendt, Alexander. 2003. "Why a World State is Inevitable." European Journal of International Relations 9(4):491–542. 1274 1275
- Wilson, Ara. 2002. "The Transnational Geography of Sexual Rights." In Truth Claims: Representation and Human Rights, edited by M.P. Bradley, and P. Petro, 253–65. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press. 1276
1277
1278
1279